

Testicular and Penile Cancer Telephone Counselling Service

For people affected by testicular or penile cancer

A diagnosis of cancer can be a frightening experience and you may feel quite isolated with a mix of emotions. Once diagnosed, treatment follows on swiftly and this can leave you in a state of shock while also feeling very vulnerable.

At Orchid, we want to support you in every way we can. We currently offer a telephone counselling service primarily for men who are dealing with the emotional challenges following diagnosis and treatment. In some cases we can also extend this service to wives, husbands and partners.

How can counselling help?

Discovering that you have cancer often comes out of the blue and your initial reaction to the diagnosis may well be one of shock and then apprehension. It isn't always easy to confide in family and friends about how you feel and it can be helpful to talk freely and in confidence to a counsellor about what has happened and how it has affected you.

As well as having to deal with your own feelings and fears, you may also find that having had a cancer diagnosis and treatment impacts on your relationships in unexpected ways, adding stress when you feel least able to cope with it.

Whether at the point of diagnosis, after treatment or because of recurring disease, being able to explore your concerns with someone who understands how challenging a cancer diagnosis can be, will help you adjust to and manage what has happened to you.

The team of counsellors to whom we will refer you are all skilled specialist therapists with many years of experience in working with cancer issues.

Please read this leaflet and if you think counselling may be of benefit to you contact the Orchid National Male Cancer Helpline 0808 802 0010 (Monday to Friday 09.30-5.30pm) or email nurse@orchid-cancer.org.uk

Practicalities

After an initial confidential discussion with one of the Orchid Male Cancer Information Nurses who will ask for basic information details, and if you both feel that counselling will be of benefit, you will be referred to a counsellor. The counsellor will contact you and offer 8 counselling sessions at times that suit you.

If, after talking to the Orchid Male Cancer Information Nurse you decide that counselling is not the right solution for you at the moment, we will do our best to signpost you to another, more appropriate service. We are here to support you however we can.

The Sessions

You will initially be offered 8 free sessions. In our experience, counselling is most effective if it takes place once a week at a regular time. However, we understand that if you are having treatment, hospital appointments may, on occasion, take precedence, and your counsellor will understand this. If after these sessions you and your counsellor feel that more sessions would be beneficial we will try to offer you subsequent sessions. You may find that you only need a few counselling sessions and you can change your mind at any stage and stop the sessions. It is important that you can be in a quiet private place to make this call and that you will not be disturbed during your future sessions. Once you have begun counselling, you can contact the counsellor if you have any queries, for example needing to change the time of your session.

Information sharing

In order to be compliant with UK data protection regulations you will be asked for your consent to share your personal information between the Counsellor and Orchid Male Cancer Information Nurse Specialist. We do not share your personal information outside of this and all information will be securely stored. No information will be recorded on our charity database unless you specifically want to be kept up to date with service developments. Further information about Orchid's Privacy Policy can be found on our website.
